

With Star Wars emerged a new sense.

Greetings reader,

I have been away for quite some time attempting to congregate my thoughts surrounding my work life and hobbies as they intersect. Recently I viewed the last 6 movies of the Star Wars franchise for the first time ever. I had been recommended these movies for quite some time, and to the many astonished at how an Aquarius can go without viewing the series most alike to the qualities of the water bearing fixed air sign, you can now rest assured. These movies, and its trademarked (I believe) phrase, "Let the force be with you," sparked an immediate association with Allah and our peace residing within the scope of all things inhabited, including ourselves.

As a person who reclaimed her artistic naturehood, sifting between having a blocked schedule of duties and assignments in conjunction with the divine patience and timing governed by the highest and channeled through us is... depressing to put it dully. Yeah, there is all this hoopla about using the grueling underpaid job for the dream, purposeful career we were destined to do, however for me, it does not resonate, and I know a lot of people are feeling the same way too. I often go through long periods of time resting, researching, and recording my experiences and where all of my work originate in inspiration from, to then spend just as much time writing/editing professionally, researching scientifically, and presenting it publicly. The force ahh, how does this tie into that... Well, as someone who knows the force in Star Wars and peace, as the Catholics say (May peace be with you), are one in the same; trusting and allowing God to take reign as things on the outside begin to loudly unrelate to the soul within as far as choices go—because at the end of the day, we choose where we put our time; our labor is a hot commodity and our souls inestimable, therefore it is us that decide what to do with it.

So I extend to all the artists in the world, which is in essence everyone, you are not alone in needing more time for yourself and your hearts desires. We are creative beings here to experience and co-create with the one who is in all. And because of this we do what we can NOW, in the present. It seems easier to complain and fester in comfort than to take reign of ones own happiness, however with the guidance and tender loving care of love itself, we can do everything.

May the force be with you.
